FLAWS

I was born in the wide, open desert, where the wind speaks in soft whispers and the earth pulses with ancient power. The red mesas stretch endlessly under the hot sun, but there's life in this place—life that's delicate, precious, and sacred. My people have always known this, living in balance with the land, understanding the ebb and flow of the seasons, the dance of predator and prey, and the wisdom of every rock and tree. The desert is alive, and I have always felt a deep connection to it.

But recently, that harmony has been shattered.

I've seen the land change. Slowly at first, then all at once. The grasslands that once bloomed vibrant with wildflowers have begun to wither. The streams, once teeming with life, are now dry, cracked beds that bear no trace of water. The creatures I once called friends—coyotes, eagles, rabbits—have grown fewer, their once abundant tracks scattered in desperation. And the sky, once clear and endless, is now tainted with a dark cloud that lingers like a sickness. It's as if the earth itself is mourning.

I could no longer stand by and watch. My heart ached for what was being lost. I had to do something. That's why I set out on my Vision Quest—seeking answers, seeking justice. I knew something was poisoning the land, something darker than just the heat or the natural shifts of time. I needed to know what it was, who it was, and how I could stop it.

But this journey is more than just a mission of vengeance. I've always felt the need to protect the land, to ensure its survival. The animals, the plants, the people—it all has to exist in harmony. Without balance, everything falls apart. So, while I search for those who would harm the land, I also seek to learn, to catalog the species that are slipping away and preserve the ones that remain. If I can help even one animal or plant species
