CHARACTER APPEARANCE

ALLIES & ORGANIZATIONS

- Informed – Few personality types are as devoted as Architects to developing rational, correct, and evidence-based opinions. Rather than hunches or half-baked assumptions, they base their conclusions on research and analysis. This gives them the conviction that they need to stand up for their ideas, even in the face of disagreement.
- Curious – Architects are open to new ideas – as long as those ideas are rational and evidence-based, that is. Skeptical by nature, Architects are especially drawn to offbeat or contrarian points of view. And if the facts prove them wrong, they are generally happy to revise their opinions.

PERSONALITY TRAITS

P THE CHESS GAME OF LIFE
Life is like a giant game of chess. Relying on strategy rather than chance, I contemplate the strengths and weaknesses of each move before I make it. And I never lose faith that, with enough ingenuity and insight, I can find a way to win – no matter what challenges might arise along the way.

IDEALS

I will get revenge on the evil forces that destroyed my place of business and ruined my livelihood.

BONDS

- Combative – Architects hate blindly following anything without understanding why. This includes restrictions and the authority figures who impose them. People with this personality type can get caught up in arguing about useless rules and regulations – but sometimes these battles are distractions from more important matters

FLAWS

They say knowledge is power. I say knowledge is leverage—and I've learned how to pull the strings from the shadows.

Once, I was part of the grand stage. A respected courtier. My salon thrived in the heart of the capital—a place where nobles debated policy over wine and music, where whispers floated lighter than smoke. I had a gift for reading the room, for knowing when to speak, when to sing, when to slip the right truth into the wrong ear.

But politics is not a game for those who trust in fairness.

I backed the wrong family. Or rather, the right one—noble of heart, but not ruthless enough. When their rivals took power, they didn't just exile their enemies. They erased them. My salon was shut down under fabricated charges of sedition. My name was dragged through court gossip like mud on silk. Allies vanished. Patrons withdrew. The rest watched in silence, unwilling to risk their own favor.

So I vanished too.

But I did not break.

Instead, I joined the College of Whispers. A fitting place for someone who already knew the weight of words, the poison hidden in pleasantries, the blade inside the rumor. I studied secrets like an art form—how to find them, how to twist them, how to let them unravel their owners from the inside out. I sing still, but now my verses carry threats between the lines. I speak praise with one breath and ruin reputations with the next.

I don't extort the innocent. I don't destroy for coin. No—I target those who climb atop the powerless, who abuse their titles and feed on fear. I take their secrets, their shame, and turn it into currency. I don't raise armies. I don't start wars. But I can
