ALLIES & ORGANIZATIONS

PERSONALITY TRAITS

IDEALS

My house's alliance with another noble family must be sustained at all costs.

BONDS

Insensitive – While not intentionally harsh, Logisticians often hurt more sensitive types' feelings by the simple mantra that honesty is the best policy. Logistician personalities may take emotions into consideration, but really only so far as to determine the most effective way to say what needs to be said.

FLAWS

I was raised in halls of marble and whispers—where a smile rarely meant trust, and every toast could mark the beginning of someone's downfall. Noble life was a game, and I learned quickly that truth was a luxury few could afford. But I've always preferred facts to flattery, clarity to comfort.

While others plotted alliances and flaunted titles, I listened. I watched. Lies unravel if you pull the right thread, and I made a quiet art of finding that thread. At first, it was survival. Then it became something more.

I discovered that the same instincts that cut through noble deceit also uncovered monsters that walked in plain sight—shapeshifters, conspirators, those who fed on fear and stayed hidden behind masks. I exposed them. I ended them. One by one.

No one asked me to take on that burden. But no one else would. So I did. Again. And again.

I'm not interested in heroics. I deal in precision, in quiet efficiency. If something needs doing, I do it—often without credit, usually alone. It's not about glory. It's about doing what others won't.

But not everyone appreciates the truth. When I turned my attention toward a certain noble family and the rot beneath their silken robes, my own house forced my hand. Their alliances mattered more than my integrity. Than justice.

So I left. Not in disgrace—just out of necessity.

Now I go where I'm needed. I find the hidden things. I pull the thread. I deal with what's uncovered, no matter how unpleasant. I don't promise comfort. I promise results.
