FLAWS

I was born in a land of sun-drenched deserts and ancient ruins, a place where the sands themselves whispered secrets of empires long lost to time. In my homeland, my name was a story all on its own, one that was woven into the very fabric of the Sultan's court. The Sultan, a capricious and cruel ruler, demanded nightly entertainment—an intricate dance of storytelling, music, and movement—that celebrated the heroic battles and legends of long-forgotten heroes. To fail in pleasing him meant certain death by the morning's light.

It was a strange way to grow up. I wasn't simply a performer; I was a living archive of the world's history, a dancing chronicle of civilizations that had crumbled to dust. Each night, I would take the stage, my every movement carefully crafted to tell a tale of valor and might, of divine wars between gods and giants, of lost dragon kingdoms and the ancient creatures that once roamed the world. And if the Sultan's mood was not satisfied, the fate of my body would be decided in the dim light of dawn.

In such an environment, I learned to keep my emotions hidden behind my dances. My joy, sorrow, anger, fear—they were all buried beneath layers of graceful steps and flowing fabrics. Instead of speaking my feelings, I wove them into the choreography of my movements. Through my dances, I learned the subtle art of defying expectations, breaking boundaries, and bending the rules. The Sultan would often command that I perform in a certain style, yet I would change the rhythm, add flourishes that were outside the norm, and twist the patterns into something new. In this, I found my freedom.

I am not like others, and I've never quite fit into any mold. I prefer to move through the world in my own way, without the shackles of convention. I live in the moment, allowing the music and the dance to guide me, not worrying about what will come
