IDEALS

I will bring terrible wrath down on the evildoers who destroyed my homeland.

BONDS

FLAWS

I was just a child when the wizard came.

No name. No warning. Just fire, ash, and the scent of wildflowers burning. One moment, our village was alive—children chasing each other between garden rows, elders telling stories beneath sun-dappled trees. The next... everything was gone. The sky cracked open with magic that had no regard for life. It wasn't just homes that were destroyed. It was the bond between people and the land that cradled them.

I ran. That's all I could do. Through smoke and ruin, into the deep wilds where no road reached. I don't remember how long I wandered before the primal spirit came to me. It didn't speak—not with words—but I felt its presence like the hush before rain. It took the shape of a stag that day, eyes glowing with the same fierce sadness that lived in me.

Since then, it's never truly left. When I call, it comes—sometimes as a creature of the land, bounding beside me through thick woods; sometimes as wings that carry me high above the canopy; sometimes as a sleek form gliding through rivers I cannot cross alone. It changes shape, but it is always the same: a spirit drawn to my heart's purpose.

I became a guide—not just through wilderness, but through the slow, painful work of rebuilding. I help villages reclaim their roots after ruin. I teach people to listen again—not to me, but to the earth beneath their feet, the wind in the trees, the rhythm of the world that endures even after everything else falls apart.

I don't believe the world will ever be perfect. But I do believe it can be better. That belief has to be enough.

My work is quiet, steady. I don't seek glory. I seek growth—new walls built where old ones crumbled,
