BONDS

FLAWS

I don't remember the Shadowfell.

They tell me I was taken when I was small—just a shadow clinging to a cloak, barely old enough to speak. The Astral Elves plucked me from that plane and brought me aboard their spelljammer, The Luminous Dirge. They gave me a uniform, a bunk in the crew quarters, and a job: serve the Commanding Officer with quiet efficiency. No questions. No attachments.

The Dirge was my world. I learned its rhythms—the soft hum of the helm, the crisp rituals of the day cycle, the way the officers' voices bent the air when they spoke to each other but never to me. I was invisible, and I preferred it that way. From the edges, I listened. I watched. I learned how people carried pain like cargo, tucked into corners they thought no one could see.

Then came the Mind Flayers.

I don't know how they got aboard. I remember screams. Silence. Then… static. I woke among the wreckage, alone and changed.

There's a pressure now, always behind my eyes—like a voice whispering just beyond the edge of hearing. Not mine. Not anyone's. I see things sometimes: flickers of thought, emotion that doesn't belong to me. I can touch minds now, feel people break open when I reach out—if I choose to. It's not magic the way the elves taught it. It's deeper. Older. Wrong, maybe. But it's part of me now.

They said I was lucky to survive. I don't feel lucky.

I left the Astral Sea. I don't know where I belong now. I wander from system to system, listening to stories that aren't mine. People trust me, even when they shouldn't. They talk. I listen. That's what I've always done.
